

ENTERING THE DRAFT EARLY: A RISKY PROPOSITION

In 1990 the NFL began to allow underclass players who had met certain requirements to declare themselves eligible for the league's entry draft.

Over the past 11 years, as shown below, more than 360 underclass players were granted draft eligibility. Of that group, two-thirds were drafted and just over ten percent signed contracts as undrafted free agents. However, almost one out of every four underclass players were never offered an NFL contract.

Many underclass players attempt to enter the league early because they believe, or have been told, that they will be drafted in the first round. Unfortunately, for too many players with such high expectations, reality has been harsh.

Of the eligible underclass players who were drafted, over forty percent went in the first round. But, when viewed as a percentage of all players who declared, there were only ten more picked in the first round than the number of players who never were able to negotiate a contract with any club.

In probability terms, there's been more than a 70% probability that any player who enters the draft early will not be selected in the first round. And that's a steep price to pay when, for example, the average dollars earned for 2000 first round draftees is more than $1.5-million a year as compared to less than $650-thousand a year for second rounders or just over $200-thousand a season for undrafted free agents.

Nor is early entry rewarded when there can be a significant difference in the amount earned between players selected at the top of a round versus those in the middle and bottom of that same round. That extreme happened in 1990, the first year underclass players entered the draft. Three first round picks that season were running backs. One was a senior and he was the number two selection. Two junior running backs also went in the first round, one at the seventeenth pick, the other at number 24. The running back who was the number two pick in the draft played for six seasons, was a starter his first two seasons, was injured in his third season, became a backup and left the league after six seasons.

The first of the two junior running backs is still active after eleven seasons and the other played eight seasons, all but one as a starter. And yet, the running back picked number two in the draft, a senior, earned more than a million dollars a year more than the two juniors in the initial contracts they signed.

Same season, same round, same position. But the player who came into the league as a senior made a lot more when he entered, and it took at least five seasons before the juniors were able to catch up with the number two pick in terms of salary earned.

The bottom line: Unless players receive a guarantee from the league and they provide just such a service that he will be picked in the top ten players selected in the first round, the probability is that he will do better by playing his final college season.

A concluding note: Many times underclass players are warned by outsiders that they should enter the draft early because of potential injury risks. What if you blow out your knee as a senior? Where will you be then?

It turns out though that it's hard to find real examples of that scenario occurring. Over the past eleven years there have been a handful at most. And compared with the earnings differential between those players who came out early versus those who played their final season, once again the wiser course has been to wait until all college eligibility is over.
